

Trailing the Redskins

Portugee waited for the men to talk over their plans. But they were quiet now. To himself he said, "I guess it is up to me to do something."

He looked at the rope in his hand again. Then he threw it into the camp fire and gave a long, sharp whistle.

"I knew it!" a man cried. "You came here with the Indians to steal our horses."

"And that is your signal," another shouted.

"You are right," Portugee said. "It is a signal. Listen!"

Soon the sound of hoof beats of a horse on the trail was heard. Then from out of the dark, a black horse raced into camp.

"Here," Portugee called. "Here, boy."
