

The Allegory Of The Cycle Of Doors - Poem by RIC BASTASA and so there is this door that appears before you and you open it and then when you enter the room another door appears this is the cycle of doors that keep on appearing and you keep on opening but the room still appears from a distance always distant from your eager feet to enter you say to enter the room i must please the door but the room moves away just the same and the door tells you to keep the room you have to burn it and when the room is burned the door finally disappears and then both the door and the room shall tell you now be happy for you now have a house of your own
