The shift to inside sales

A shift to inside sales—also known as virtual, remote, or digital sales—is underway for B2B industries. Companies are finding increasing value in inside sales and are making it a more significant part of their sales teams, with 42,400 non-retail inside sales jobs being created per year. Inside sales departments are maturing, with reps achieving higher quota percentages than their outside sales counterparts.¹

Three reasons companies are making the shift²:

B2B sellers feel competitive pressure to cut costs and are seeking more efficient ways to sell.

B2B buyers are becoming more comfortable purchasing and collaborating remotely.

New and easy-to-use online webinar and videoconferencing technologies make it possible to create customer intimacy.

Specialize your role

Are your sales professionals spending time in the entire sales funnel? Each part of the sales process requires a different skillset. Instead of relying on your sales representatives to be great at everything, put people into roles that maximize their strengths. Doing so could fill your pipeline quicker.

Some people are better and more comfortable as “openers” or conversation starters. Others are more adept at closing. Instead of paying large salaries to generalists who have strengths and weaknesses, consider separating these roles. Inside sales allows you to hire specialists who can cover the entire sales lifecycle.

Most common inside sales roles

In a contemporary sales acceleration model, the sales team uses account-based selling methods, rather than calling individual leads. Account-based selling is a hot topic within inside sales. Through this method, you identify potential clients and target many personas to have a conversation with named accounts. Each type of buyer requires customized messaging from marketing and sales, which speaks to their specific needs.

The inside sales team has specific roles such as:

Multichannel communications

Gone are the days of building an inside sales center that just cranks out 100 dials per rep, per day. The telephone is only one communication channel, and while it will most likely continue to be the primary source, the buyers of today have different preferences. The future of inside sales will include a multichannel approach—and the future is now.

journey is digital.*

Measuring engagement

There are many channels you can use to communicate with buyers. Most communication channels are affordable but require training and time to build. Your inside sales teams need to employ a variety to allow the buyer to engage in the format he/she prefers. Video is one channel that is growing rapidly. Data from the AA-ISP annual survey shows that 22.4 percent of inside sales teams occasionally use video in their sales process, 8.6 percent use video frequently, and 4.6 percent plan to implement.

Developing an inside sales strategy

A properly developed inside sales strategy means:

- You can increase revenue from your tier B, C, and D accounts and maximize your mature products.
- You'll receive quicker responses from potential customers, when using a multichannel approach.
- Specialized roles will fill the pipeline faster. Account executives or business development representatives will focus where they should: presenting, proposing, and closing to gain new customers.
- Inside salespeople who are all in the same location are easier to coach and develop.
- You can offer work-from-home opportunities as an added benefit to attract talent. Today's telephony technology allows managers to see real-time work activity and listen in for coaching.
- Sales expense is optimized through reduction of the cost of sales by 40 percent to 90 percent—relative to field sales—while revenue is increased (according to the Harvard Business Review).

Don't miss an opportunity

Our partners at InsideSales.com have reported that more than 50 percent of B2B sales jobs are now inside sales roles. Even if you haven't considered how to leverage an inside sales strategy, chances are your competition is reviewing their sales efficiency options.

The majority of B2B buyers do not prefer a face-to-face meeting, according to research conducted by Sales Benchmark Index.

Inside sales myths dispelled

MYTH #1: OUTSOURCING = OFFSHORE.

Proximity of the work outsourced to the client can be across the street or in a neighboring state. While the economic drivers of outsourcing can push the work to low-cost locations such as India or the Philippines, sometimes it makes more sense to keep the work in the same time zone for reasons that are unique to your business. There might be companies in the next state, in the next city, or right across your street that can do the job for you.

MYTH #2: OUTSOURCING IS NOT FOR STARTUPS.

While large companies have been instrumental in making outsourcing a routine activity, startups have not exactly been shy about wooing “outside” partners. In fact, size does not matter here. Often startups know exactly what they want from the vendor, because they are just beginning a greenfield project. They end up saving huge amounts of time before even launching their project.

MYTH #3: OUTSOURCING IS LOW COST AND LOW END.

There are many reasons for outsourcing and sometimes buyers really need access to talent or scale they cannot find in their home location. For example, if you needed a project completed with 1,000 programmers who had a certain mix of skill sets with true scale and complexity, you might choose to pay more to ensure your project is completed on time and in budget to support the business.

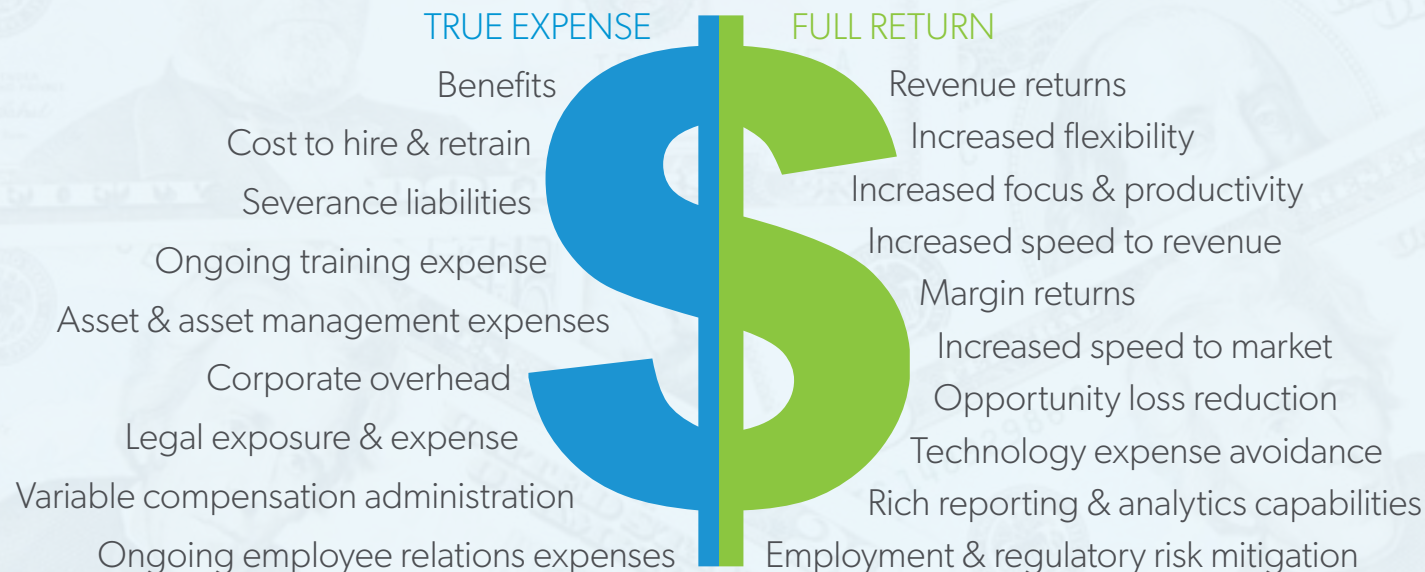

Alternatively, you could get it cheaper and risk the certainty of completion. A wise CFO once shared that he initially outsourced for the lower cost but stayed for the quality. Some of the best underwriter teams in the world are in Bangalore, not Cincinnati. Just like the point above, what you outsource does not need to always be low-end work, although the bulk of what you might want to source out when you start outsourcing is exactly that. If the experience is a happy one, most companies entrust the vendor with more complex work over time.

Optimize sales expense and maximize returns

Using high-value business process outsourcing (BPO) is one solid strategy to optimize your sales expense and maximize your returns. However, you must consider the true expense and the full return of the BPO equation.

When analyzing the true expense, include direct and indirect expenses—as the carrying cost of a sales employee can be more than 26 percent of his base salary. This is important when comparing internal expense to the resource expense in a sales BPO model. On the return side, look at committed revenue attainment as well as expense savings or expense avoidance opportunities to calculate the full return.
