

In English you cannot connect two sentences with a comma else you get a “comma splice.” Also, you cannot write two sentences together without some type of coordinating conjunction else you get a “run-on-sentence”.

Example of an incorrect sentence structure: Michael hates school he does his homework anyway.
(this is a run-on-sentence error)

This is also incorrect: Michael hates school, he does his homework anyway. (This is a comma splice error)

The only way to correct this sentence is to use “coordinating conjunctions” (But – or – yet – so – for – and – nor or B-O-Y-S-F-A-N) are used to connect two sentences.

→ But (means “in contrast or however”)

Ex - Michael hates school, but he does his homework anyway.

→ Or (selection between two choices)

Ex – Michael will go to work, or he will stay home due to his cold.

→ Yet (means “despite all that happened before” )

Ex – Michael’s eyes are so tired from driving all day, yet he keeps on driving to reach his destination.

→ So (means “as a result / for that reason” )

Ex – Michael earns good money at work, so he enjoys working overtime to make more money.

→ For (another way of saying “because”)

Ex – Michael wants to find a new job, for his current one doesn’t allow him any vacation time.

→ And (means “additional information”)

Ex – Michael loves his new job, and he is popular with his co-workers in the company.

→ Nor (means not one nor the other in a negative context – It’s the negative of “or”)

Ex - Michael didn’t get a job promotion, nor did he get a raise in his salary.

Notice – there is a comma before each coordinating conjunction to indicate 2 sentences are being connected.
