Example:

Why we laugh isn't a mystery anymore. The questions about appropriate vs. inappropriate laughter, about laughing "with" vs. "at" someone, about how our relationship with others in our immediate social circle affects our laugh response, even the evolutionary origins of laughter...these have been worked out with a new, but little known theory published in 2008.

The theory defines laughter as "a vocal affirmation of mutual vulnerability." If my friend spills gravy on his tie, my reminding him of our mutual vulnerability (that I too sometimes have trouble with such tasks) is welcomed. It is, in this context, a signal of sympathy, of solidarity. His status has been diminished by his actions, and my laughter effectively raises him back up (Lifting Laughter). If my pain-in-the-butt coworker, who thinks he's so much better than I, highlights his shortcomings by spilling HIS gravy, then reminding him of our mutual vulnerability is my way of saying, "See, you're not as great as you think you are." Same message, just a different motivation (Lowering Laughter) and different response, most likely unwelcomed. These are examples of what we commonly refer to as laughing WITH someone and laughing AT them.

The same is true when laughing at our own vulnerabilities. Nervous (Self-Lifting) Laughter reminds others around us (or, if alone, ourselves) that others probably suffer the same fate sometimes. It solicits supportive responses (incl. Lifting Laughter) from those who might be nearby. And if our status is raised by some random or seemingly undeserved victory (e.g., a lottery win), then an expression of mutual vulnerability (Self-Lowering Laughter) is an acknowledgment that those around us could have won just as well, that our good fortune is not going to sever old friendships.

In all these cases, the message is the same even though the motivation and effects on others might differ. Just like a car horn (Hey!) can sometimes express the sender's desire to say, "Hey, stop!" or "Hey, go!" And, similarly, a car horn can be welcomed when pressed by a loved one you've been waiting patiently for, or unwelcomed when pressed by the idiot behind you in rush hour traffic. It's all a matter of context and relationship. 1

Listening is the most important skill and often the most challenging. In our experience, mental health nurses often worry about what they are going to say, what questions they should ask, or whether they have asked the right question. While such concerns are common and understandable for the newcomer to mental health nursing, these thoughts can distract the mental health nurse from listening to the person who is talking. 1

This book explore the future of East Asia's middle-income countries. Without the advantages of low wages or high skills, and with limited natural resources, East Asian economies are following a new path of regional integration, led by China. Along this path, policy makers must manage a migration of 2 million per month to East Asian cities; a sharp and unprecedented increase in income inequality; and growing discontent with corruption. This new agenda of domestic integration is the main challenge facing East Asia. 1
