

AP® English Literature 1999 Sample Student Responses

The materials included in these files are intended for non-commercial use by AP teachers for course and exam preparation; permission for any other use must be sought from the Advanced Placement Program. Teachers may reproduce them, in whole or in part, in limited quantities, for face-to-face teaching purposes but may not mass distribute the materials, electronically or otherwise. These materials and any copies made of them may not be resold, and the copyright notices must be retained as they appear here. This permission does not apply to any third-party copyrights contained herein.

These materials were produced by Educational Testing Service (ETS), which develops and administers the examinations of the Advanced Placement Program for the College Board. The College Board and Educational Testing Service (ETS) are dedicated to the principle of equal opportunity, and their programs, services, and employment policies are guided by that principle.

The College Board is a national nonprofit membership association dedicated to preparing, inspiring, and connecting students to college and opportunity. Founded in 1900, the association is composed of more than 3,900 schools, colleges, universities, and other educational organizations. Each year, the College Board serves over three million students and their parents, 22,000 high schools, and 3,500 colleges, through major programs and services in college admission, guidance, assessment, financial aid, enrollment, and teaching and learning. Among its best-known programs are the SAT®, the PSAT/NMSQT™, the Advanced Placement Program® (AP®), and Pacesetter®. The College Board is committed to the principles of equity and excellence, and that commitment is embodied in all of its programs, services, activities, and concerns.

Copyright © 2001 by College Entrance Examination Board. All rights reserved. College Board, Advanced Placement Program, AP, and the acorn logo are registered trademarks of the College Entrance Examination Board.

The passage from The Crossing conveys a sense of awe and mystery, and in doing so, imparts the depths of the man's emotions towards the wolf. The mourning <sup>as</sup> for the wolf is raised to an elegiac level, ~~and~~ the man reflects upon the wolf, "at once terrible and of a great beauty." Several devices are employed to effectively enhance the tone of reverence and loss, ~~and~~ including figurative language, diction, sentence structure, rhythm, and repetition.

The pace of the passage fluctuates, alternating from short, detached sentences, such as "He squatted over the wolf and touched her fur. He touched the cold and perfect teeth," to unusually long sentences which are connected by conjunctions (mostly "and") and which serve to reflect the outpouring of emotions and the blurred response the man is experiencing, as in lines 41–47 ("The eye... before her"). This dichotomy in sentence structure ~~only underline~~ emphasizes the periods where the man is overcome by remembrances and extrapolations.

The figurative language interspersed within the passage is also highly effective, causing an air of mystery, ~~and~~ wonder, and respect. This mood is set when the cries of the coyotes are described, "seemingly to have no origin other than the night itself." The analogy of the sheet steaming <sup>(lines 21–24)</sup> enhances the aura of power and sacredness by diction such as "celebrants of some sacred passion" and "burning scrim". This sense of ~~ritual~~<sup>a</sup> religious power is again by his companion to a "dozing penitent". A sense of the awing mixture of terror and beauty is evidenced when the narrator compares the wolf's soul to "flowers that feed on flesh"; introducing an element of ~~the almost henifying, yet overall~~ ~~is wonder inspiring into the depiction of the wolf.~~ how "all was fear and marvel" regarding the wolf.

The repetition of certain phrases and words emphasized the ideas behind them. For example, "What we may well believe has power to cut and shape and hollow out of the dark form of the world surely if wind can, if rain can." The repetition contained within this sentence really clarifies the point that our beliefs shape our perception. Also, the repetition of "and" throughout the passage, as in lines 15-21, brings a rhythm to the passage while providing a sense of the man not really realizing what he is doing, only going through the motions.

The unspecific pronoun "He" actually provides a contrast where the grief of the man becomes more poignant. The passage ~~slowly~~ metamorphasizes from a more detached account about man's treatment of the body to a touching scene where the man reflects upon the wolf and her spirit.

The final ~~paragraph~~<sup>thoughts</sup>, and especially the last line, is made more important by the reflections of the man. The last line is particularly emphasized by the complete lack of punctuation, ~~and~~ which Conveys the magnitude of the man's loss. His utter grief over losing the wolf is fully revealed to the reader in it,<sup>especially the last 4 words,</sup> ~~along with~~ in stating, "But which cannot be held never be held and is no flower but is swift and a huntress and the wind itself is in terror of it and the world cannot lose it".

The importance of the wolf's hole in "the possible world ordained by God of which she was one among and not separate from" is made known to the reader by the man's thoughts and actions. In doing so, and in the setting (with the sun beginning to "faintly gray" the east), a mood of respectful reverence and wonderful power is created. The ~~old~~ man is shown to be deeply impacted by his experience.

In the dark of the night it runs swiftly along the mountains, up the slopes, past the creek, faster than the winds. What is this "it" that runs so freely after the body is dead, and decaying? It is surely the soul that escapes after death and returns to its home. In the passage from McCarthy's "The Crossing" the soul of the dying wolf leaves the body and the man carrying him, to return to his homeland. McCarthy uses imagery and the description of the complete narrative experience to recount the philosophical revelation that the protagonist encounters as he caresses the death in the tranquility of nature.

An outstanding quality about this narrative is the care with which each imagery is told. One images' repetitious image is that of dark and light. The narrative begins in the dark, though close to dawn. The coyotes call from the "dark shapes of the rimlands", the image giving a clear picture of the grandeur of nature in which the narrator now sits. There is also the image of the weak fire lit in the cold darkness, a symbol<sup>perhaps</sup> for some hope after death. The fire at first dies; the main character must fan it and relight it, until the dawn sky begins to gray.

what the main character experiences at dawn can be called mysticism, a philosophical epiphany, and a new window of understanding. Such a tone of mystery and enigma is created in the final paragraph (lines 40-65) through the change in the style of writing. The narrative here uses long sentences that run continuous as a stream. The sentences begin to loose the ordinary grammatical form that the narrative followed earlier; "what blood and bone are made of but can themselves not make on any altar nor by any wound of war." The narrative story leaves its narrative flow, and begins to build on the image of what that is passing by the main character's closed eyes, as the limited or omniscient third person narrator can do. The passage has religious allusions, "ordained by God", as well as personification that breathes life into the mountain "the flowers feed on flesh", the wind and rain "cut and shape" the land, and the soul runs wildly through this nation.

The experience teaches illuminates the power of nature and the strength of the soul to the main character. He, in reaching out "to hold what cannot be held," grasped in the moment the mystery of death and eternity, the enigma that is conveyed through the powerful images in this narrative.

The techniques employed by McCarthy here create an increasingly pinched and thoughtful recollection of the main character's remorse. The first lines give no indication of any problem until it bluntly says, "His trousers were stiff with blood." This introduces, in a startling way, the main character's dilemma. There are only hints of guilt thus far, however. This is hinted at by the explicit attention to the state of the wolf, for instance, "She was stiff and cold and her fur was bristly..." Also, later there are coyotes howling in a haunting way because "their cries seemed to have no origin other than the night itself."

The second paragraph gets more definite about half-way through it. The sheet was washed of the wolf's blood and then set by the fire on a frestle pole. This is still unconvincing until the work talks about how this scene resembled "a burning scrim standing in a wilderness... some sacred passion... fled in the night at the fear of their own daring." This account seems severely tinted by an attitude of guilt and self-incrimination equal to that of Poe's beating heart and that of Crime and Punishment. However, this is over a wolf, not a human being.

The third paragraph leaves absolutely no room for doubt. It starts with, "He fell asleep... like some dying penitent." When he awoke he sat by her "and closed his own eyes that he could see her running in the mountains..." Next, there was a virtual role-call of her prey "ordained by God of which she was one among and not separate from"

This is a further statement of his guilt. Then he "reached to hold what cannot be held," which is the spirit of the wolf. What is left of the passage is mostly spent on elaborating on the concept of that spirit. It was "terrible and of great beauty, like flowers that feed on flesh." As the emotion gets higher, punctuation lessens and what comes out is a Hemingway-like burst of thought. It can shape rock "surely if wind can, if rain can." "But which cannot be held is never held and is no flower but is swift and a huntress and the wind itself is in terror of it and the world cannot lose it." This demonstrates how McCarthy thinks of that spirit, and how the main character realizes these things through his guilt and remorse.* The main character gets increasingly emotional and philosophical as the author relates, without mentioning that. Although there are no quotation marks, any tags on the thoughts stating that they are those of the main character, it is obvious through McCarthy's style.